Not illustrated. 1900 Excerpt: .patch of snow or water, or even by touching damp earth. The perfect development of the pearlitic patches points, however, to the rail having been normally cooled. If the rail had been locally quenched and martensite produced, it would, I believe, have been immediately obliterated by heat transmitted from the hot mass of the rail so that no trace of martensitic structure would remain. If this view is correct the structure of the St. Neots rail would point to the changes having been effected while the rail was actually in use. The remaining photographs on this plate are also interesting. Figure 5 represents the results of quenching rail steel, of similar composition to the St. Neots rail, at a temperature of 720. It resembles the upper or altered layer of the St. Neots rail, but the higher magnification (figure 7) proves it to consist of martensite...
